

U.S. ARMY NATIVE AMERICAN CULTURAL RESOURCES

Innovative policies, programs and initiatives establish the Department of the Army as a leader in Native American cultural resources management. The Army implements its Native American cultural resources program through policy in Army Regulation 200-4, Cultural Resources Management.

Army policy emphasizes tribal sovereignty and the government-to-government relationship between the Army and federally recognized Indian tribes. It encourages consultation and interaction with tribal governments during program and project planning, development and implementation.

The Army strives to further enhance communication with tribal government representatives through conferences, compliance and educational activities.

ARMY-NATIVE PEOPLES PARTNERING CONFERENCES

The Army hosted several workshops and conferences designed to promote open communication. At these meetings Army and tribal representatives share information about topics affecting Native Americans and Army installations.

Discussion topics have included:

- Status of Army compliance with the Native American Graves Protection and Repatriation Act (NAGPRA);
- Access to sacred sites under Executive Order 13007, "Indian Sacred Sites," and the American Indian Religious Freedom Act (AIRFA);
- Identification of traditional religious and cultural properties;
- Department of Defense efforts to draft Indian policy; and
- Army development of alternative Section 106 (National Historic Preservation Act) compliance procedures.

These conferences brought together more than 100 Army personnel and tribal representatives from all regions of the country, successfully encouraging communication and resolution of issues. The Army plans to continue sponsoring such gatherings in the future.

NATIVE AMERICAN GRAVES PROTECTION AND REPATRIATION ACT COMPLIANCE

The Army's NAGPRA compliance program is the most comprehensive program in the Department of Defense (DoD). Through a centrally managed and funded effort, the Army completed all reports required by NAGPRA efficiently and consistently, creating a significant economy of scale. This effort resulted in 97 Army installation

EXECUTIVE ORDER 13007, "INDIAN SACRED SITES"

Under Executive Order 13007, "Indian Sacred Sites," the Army is responsible for protecting and providing reasonable access to American Indian sacred sites on land it controls. The 17 installations that have sacred sites accommodate a variety of ceremonial practices ranging from individual prayers, to reburials of ancestral remains, to rituals involving numerous participants.

GUIDELINES FOR ARMY CONSULTATION WITH NATIVE AMERICANS

Medicine Bluffs, Fort Sill, OK

Guidelines for Army Consultation with Native Americans (Department of the Army Pamphlet 200-4, Appendix F), provides guidance not only for consultation with American Indians, but also Alaska Natives and Native Hawaiians. These guidelines provide information on trust relations, government-to-government responsibilities and tribal government structure. Major issues include public disclosure and confidentiality, reburial practices and access to religious and sacred sites. The guidelines also discuss legal mandates governing federal agency responsibilities to Native Americans.

NATIVE AMERICAN TRAINING INITIATIVE

The Army is leading a DoD effort to develop training for DoD and military department personnel to better understand American Indian and Alaska Native cultures and meet statutory requirements for tribal consultation. Reciprocal training to help tribal representatives understand DoD "culture" and deal effectively with military departments will also be developed. The Army's commitment to advancing DoD policies is evident in its efforts to foster open communication and understanding between the military and Native Americans.
